Sarah Caldwell is the Project Manager at Living Stone Design + Build, in Asheville, North Carolina. She is a linear thinker, passionate organizer, problem solver and spirited strategist. Her skill set fits well with the technical side of Interior Design where sketches and concepts are turned into construction documents, details are refined, specifications are written, and orders are placed. Her career started in the Marine Corps as a files and directives clerk where she learned to read and understand government documents and manuals, institute standard operating procedures, and be a careful proofreader. She has worked in the construction field since 1996 when she received an Interior Design degree from the Art Institute of Philadelphia and has practiced for the majority of her career in the single-family custom home industry. Several of those years were spent designing timber framed homes which were built in Western North Carolina. During the recession Sarah returned to school and obtained a Sustainable Technologies Degree. She currently shares responsibility with her team to make sure that all of the homes they produce at Living Stone Design + Build are Energy Star rated, and Indoor AirPLUS and Greenbuilt certified. Sarah holds a Certified Aging in Place Specialist (CAPS) designation from the National Home Builders Association and is Wellness Within Your Walls (WWYW) certified. She is a wife and mother of five and lives outside of Asheville with her husband and 3 children who are still in the home. She currently serves as ASID Carolinas Design Communities Chair for the Western Carolina District.
